Tablet	What the AP's Collaboration With the Nazis Should Teach Us About Reporting the News Is it better to collaborate with dictatorships and authoritarian regimes and tell half the story with hands tied — or not tell the story at all? "...The most relevant example from my own experience as an AP correspondent in Jerusalem between 2006 and 2011 is Gaza, which is controlled by Hamas, and where the AP has a sub-bureau. Running that sub-bureau requires both passive and active cooperation with Hamas. To give one example of many, during the Israel-Hamas war that erupted at the end of 2008, our local Palestinian reporter in Gaza informed the news desk in Jerusalem that Hamas fighters were dressed as civilians and were being counted as civilians in the death toll—a crucial detail. A few hours later, he called again and asked me to strike the detail from the story, which I did personally; someone had clearly spoken to him, and the implication was that he was at risk. (After I published this detail in an essay for Tablet in 2014, the bureau chief at the time confirmed it, adding that a refusal to comply would have put our reporter's life in danger.) From that moment on, more or less, AP's coverage from Gaza became a quiet collaboration with Hamas. Certain rules were made clear to the local staffers in Gaza, and those of us outside Gaza were warned not to put our Gazan staff at risk. Our coverage shifted accordingly, though we never informed our readers. Hamas military actions were left vague or ignored, while the effects of Israeli actions were reported at length, giving the impression of wanton Israeli aggression, just as Hamas wanted. When a reporter wrote a story about Hamas censorship in the summer of 2014, editors shelved it. We were trading truth for access and providing an illusion of 'coverage' that was actually propaganda—a kind all the more effective because it was not tagged 'propaganda' but simply 'Gaza City (AP).' You can show genuine footage of a house destroyed by an Israeli strike, but if you don't show the Hamas fighters launching a rocket from the backyard, your report is a lie..."	MATTI FRIEDMAN	Media
